

Abstract

A system-level simulation of hardware devices utilizes interconnection objects to facilitate communication between a simulated device and the system, or between different simulated devices. A device may send output data to the interconnection object and/or receive input from the interconnection object. Additionally, the interconnection object may have some data-validation capability for incoming and outgoing data.